

A Kooky Manifesto

The game is broken.
Everyone knows it.
Almost no one knows how to stop playing.

Some try to outplay it. Others fight it.
We do neither. We change the game itself.

We call ourselves Kooks. And we carry AK69 – not a weapon of war, but of love.

Changing the game requires becoming a different kind of player.
The kind who dances around rules rather than breaking them.

We refuse false binaries:

Seriousness or Satire. Idealism or Cynicism. Order or Chaos.

We inherit wisdom and integrity. Play and risk. Optimism and respect for shadow.

And most critically: the ability to hold paradoxes lightly and change games rather than fight inside broken ones.

We don't seek to dominate systems. We seek to transcend them.
With connection and coordination.

We choose crooked paths for wicked problems, knowing straight lines fail in nonlinear crises.

We wield memes, stories, and rituals as weapons against Moloch, not just entertainment.

We build while others argue and laugh while others panic.

We are sincere without being naive. Playful without being reckless.
Hopeful without being utopian.

We refuse despair as an option and seriousness as a religion.

In times of collapse, sincerity alone breaks and nihilism leads nowhere.

Together, we become anti-fragile.

Kooks survive and help others survive.

By fusing care with comedy, action with irony, structure with surprise.

The old game is to compete until everyone dies.

The new game is to coordinate until everyone thrives.

We call it Anti Krisis.

The metacrisis is real and daunting.

And it needs all of us to unite.

The window is closing sooner than we think.

If you've read this, you're already playing.

Now play like you mean it.
